The Pink Fairy Armadillo is the smallest of the armadillo species in the world. It is 3.5 to 4.5 cm in length and about 110 grams in weight. It can sit on the palm of a human hand. Like its larger armadillo cousins, the pink fairy armadillo has a shell on its top side. But unlike them, it is pinkish in hue. The pink colour is derived from the animal's blood vessels which are visible through the shell. It is unique to this species. So is the extremely fine white hair visible from beneath the shell. Those blood vessels and that silky hair are both part of the creature's thermoregulation system that enables it to the extreme variation in temperature in its habitat in central Argentina. Exposing more blood to silly hot air or soil—making the outer skin appear more pink—would lower the armadillo's body temperature, while draining the blood would enable the creature to hang on to the heat it needs during the colder periods at night, as would the hair, which acts as a kind of insulation.

Unfortunately, these tiny marvels are extremely hard to study because they spend the bulk of their lives burrowing underground in search of ants and larvae, using their powerful claws on both their front and hind legs, which enable them to travel through the soil below ground at surprising rate of speed. The pink fairy armadillo is extremely sensitive to stress and none has survived in captivity for more than eight days or so. While habitats change, increasing use of pesticides and even a growing population of domestic cats and dogs are believed to be driving the Pink Fairy Armadillo to near extinction. Scientists have not been able to determine the status of this elusive species.

- (a) What is the smallest armadillo species and what are its length and weight? 2
- (b) What is the speciality of the smallest armadillo species? 2
